

Bunge/Corn Products

Customer and Supplier Q+A

1. Does this change anything in the near-term?

- In the near term, it is “business as usual.” There are no changes to your commercial contacts, contracting, customer service, etc.
- When the transaction closes and as the integration occurs, there could be some changes in day-to-day operations, but overall we view this combination as an opportunity to provide a better product portfolio, provide a single source for products, and increase the innovation of our offerings.
- We will work to maintain our high standards of customer and supplier relationships

2. How will this affect my current contract and/or pending orders with Bunge?

- This transaction does not impact your current contract or pending orders with Bunge.

3. If I am also a customer of Corn Products, will I be able to place a joint order going forward?

- We anticipate that one of the benefits of this combination will be improved service for customers, and this includes serving as single source for a broad portfolio of products.
- As the integration planning moves forward, we will work with our sales and distribution teams to ensure the best processes and systems to put in place after closing.

4. If I am also a customer of Corn Products, which sales contact should I use going forward?

- In the near-term, please contact your current sales representative. As the integration planning moves forward, we will be working with the experienced sales teams of both companies to design the best processes and systems to serve our customers following the closing. Should your contact change, we will communicate that to you.

5. When will the two companies be fully integrated and operational?

- Once the transaction is complete, the combined company will work to become fully integrated as quickly as possible. However, it is too soon to put a timetable forward. The integration will be a careful and deliberate process.
